

The Musiclovers Handbook: Containing (1) A Pronouncing Dictionary of Musical Terms and (2) Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Musiclovers Handbook: Containing (1) A Pronouncing Dictionary of Musical Terms and (2) Biographical Dictionary of Musicians All Italian, French, and German words are written out phonetically, on the following system: A as in far, represented by ah. The Continental e has the sound of a in fare; it is represented by eh. The Continental i has the sound of e in deer; it is represented by ee. The following vowel sounds have no equivalents in English: French e, when not accented, something like the vowel sound in love. German o (o modified, or Umlaut) has nearly the same sound. German ii is about half-way between the sound of o in love and e in deer. O and u have the same sound as in English, the u sound being represented by oo, as in cool. Italian ae has the sound of long i in English. German a is the equivalent of a in air. German eu is sounded like oi, as in toil. The following consonantal sounds have no English equivalents: German hard guttural ach and soft guttural ag. The French sound of j is represented by zh as nearly as possible. The French nasals an, en, in, on, can be represented but very unsatisfactorily in English only by adding a final g. Whenever ch is found it is to be sounded like ch lr chair. C always has this sound in Italian when followed by i or e. The Italian ch, on the contrary, always has the sound of k, or c hard, and is thus represented. The Italian zz has the sound of ts or ds, and is thus represented. With this explanation of the phonetic system adopted to represent the foreign sounds, it is believed that the reader will find no difficulty in acquiring their proper pronunciation.
